

A springtime wander around Yorkshire's olfactory landscape

Yorkshire, in the north of the UK, is a diverse county. It touches the wild North Sea on its Eastern side, has stretches of moorland and forest, and is home to the bustling cities of plentiful drizzle and light rain interspersed with bright days of sunshine. As such, the local flora tends to spring to life quickly here, transforming from the muddy greys of winter to much perkier greens quite quickly and at the first touches of sunshine. I often find this reminiscent of mossy fragrances such as Alphaora by Pierre Guillaume or Mousse Arashiyama by Le Jardin Retrouve. Of course, mossy fragrances are multifarious, but it is these lighter, springier mosses I tend to associate with the rapidly greening countryside here.
